THE ORTHODOX FRIENDS BURYING GROUND

YONGE STREET, NEWMARKET, ONTARIO

The Orthodox Friends burying ground on Yonge Street, Newmarket, Ontario is the oldest Quaker historic site in central Ontario that is still in use. The first initiative by Friends to obtain land for a burying ground was in the Twelfth Month of 1805, when Amos Armitage and Nathaniel Pearson were appointed by Friends to contract with Asa and Mary Rogers for land for a meeting house. The Rogers' agreed to provide two acres at a price of $18 an acre, the cost of clearing. Title to the property, located on the northeast corner of lot 92 concession 1 on the west side of Yonge Street, King Township, was given to the Trustees of the Meeting in Sixth Month 1807. In 1810, after a large number of deaths due to an epidemic in the years 1808-1809, the Meeting purchased an additional 1 7/8 acres north and adjoining the land obtained from the Rogers. This was the new site for the meeting house, with the Rogers' land designated as the burying ground.

In 1828 a separation occurred in the Yonge Street Friends Meeting, with the separatists known as Hicksites, after Elias Hicks, a Quaker leader in the United States, who was responsible in part for similar separations there. The Hicksite Friends withdrew from the main group of Friends and established their own meeting house and burying ground about a mile south at Armitage, on part of the farm of William I. Phillips.¹ The larger group of Friends became known as the Orthodox Friends.

Another separation occurred in 1881, but this time only within the Orthodox group. A number of Friends withdrew because they objected to changes which they felt would permit radical innovations more like those of the revivals then sweeping Ontario. This group became known as the Conservative Friends or Wilburites, after John Wilbur a Quaker leader of Rhode Island who was involved in a similar controversy in 1845; the larger continuing group became known as the Progressive Friends or Gurneyites, after the English Quaker Joseph John Gurney, who visited Canada in the 1870s and influenced many Friends with his theological interpretations of Quaker beliefs. Many of the issues in the separations involved the importance of traditions and separation from 'worldly' practices as defined by one of the groups involved in the dispute. Younger Friends were impatient with traditionalists, and wanted to adopt newer practices in Quaker worship and governance. Although the Conservatives maintained control of the meeting house, the burying ground came under the Progressives.² After each of the separations, only those members of the group that controlled the burying ground could be buried there. The burying ground was a place where the changing attitudes and practices of the living were given expression, particularly in the use and form of grave markers. The Yonge Street burying ground consists of a continuous, coherent body of evidence to demonstrate the changing beliefs and practices of the Yonge Street Quakers from 1807 to the present.

In the twentieth century both Conservative and Progressive Friends experienced a sharp decline in membership. This factor, and the participation of Friends not personally involved in the separations, saw a mellowing of the hard feelings between the two groups, so that some Conservative Friends were buried in the burying ground, although most Conservatives preferred to be buried in the Pine Orchard Friends burying ground, at Pine Orchard, Whitchurch Twp., or the Conservative Friends burying ground in the Village of Pickering, Ontario.

In 1968 a survey of the burying ground was prepared by John McSkimming, P.L.S., of Toronto, at the request of the Trustees of the property, so that the Trustees could comply with the provisions of the Cemeteries Act of Ontario which required the establishment of accurate records of interments and a perpetual care fund.³

A list of the inscriptions on the markers in the burying ground was published in the York Pioneer of 1965, and was prepared in 1963-64 by the boys of the Preparatory Department of Pickering College, Newmarket, Ontario.⁴ During the years 1981 and 1982 the author collected information on the location of interments, the shape, decoration and inscriptions on markers. Mr. Brian Boyle, of the Photography Department, Royal Ontario Museum, took photographs of markers, so there would be a permanent record of the various types. During the field work it was clear that many details of the historic burying ground had not been published, and the list of inscriptions in the York Pioneer of 1965 was incomplete, and in some instances, inaccurate. This article discusses some of the features of the burying ground and provides a revised list of inscriptions.

Quaker burial grounds were established adjacent to meeting houses, a characteristic of Canadian and American Friends settlements. Even during the second half of the nineteenth century when burials in public cemeteries became popular, Quakers continued to establish their own grounds. This practice may reflect Friends' experiences in previous centuries when, as a non-Conformist group, they were excluded from using Church cemeteries.

Graves in traditional Christian cemeteries were often placed on an east-west axis, with the feet of the deceased to the east. This practice was in preparation for the Second Coming of Christ, when the faithful would rise to face the Saviour. The Orthodox Friends burying ground has graves on an east-west axis, with inscriptions on the west face of the markers, away from Yonge Street, but with foot stones, when present, indicating that the feet of the deceased were, according to traditional Christian practice, to the east.

In the early decades of the nineteenth century, Friends did not mark graves or keep any written plan of the location of burials. Death soon brought anonymity in the burying ground. Describing Quaker practices in Colonial America, Frost states, "families would not be buried together; rather, there would be a systematic filling up of the burial ground".⁵ The same practice is reported by the late Elmer Starr, a Friend whose family had been associated with the Conservative Friends at Yonge Street. He stated, "people were buried according to the order in which they died. That's the way Yonge Street graveyard is...according to date. I have been surprised to find that a Rogers will be buried in one place, and maybe some more Rogers in another place".⁶ The advent of the grave marker in the 1830s enabled families to be buried in adjacent plots. Friends never permitted family plots with marked borders, which would have indicated the social rank or wealth of the family of the deceased.

Grave markers were made of field stone, wooden board or post, cast iron, marble or granite. The use of field stones as markers has been attributed to the economic conditions of pioneering life. There is no evidence for this assumption among Friends. Very few field stone markers remain in the Orthodox burying ground, as only larger, inscribed stones are likely to survive decades of caretakers. The best preserved field stone is shown in figure 1. Wooden boards or posts, if used at Yonge Street, do not survive, although the 1965 survey lists a wooden post, but I have not been able to locate this. One grave marker of cast iron remains, and it only the back plate for a metal plaque which had the inscription (fig.2). The majority of markers were of marble and granite. Marble tablet markers were easier to inscribe than field stone, and could be supplied in a number of pre-cut shapes.

Early marble tablets were square or rectangular, the size being governed in part by the number and length of the lines of inscription and the views of the members of the Meeting. The tablet form was in four shapes: square or rectangular with a flat upper surface (type 1); a slightly curving upper edge resembling a Romanesque arch (type 2), a peaked upper edge forming a Norman arch (type 3), and a corbelled upper edge, resembling a Gothic arch (type 4). Non-tablet markers of more elaborate shapes and granite material were placed in a separate category called type 5.

Stones with a horizontal top were in two size-ranges: a rectangular table of 4" to 6" width and a length of 20" or more, which were set directly in the ground and were footstones to mark the outer edge of burial plots; a rectangular or square marker 12" to 20" in width and 12" to 25" long, usually mounted on a base (fig.3). The square or rectangular marble tablet was a predominate form in the Yonge Street Orthodox burying ground from the 1830s through the 1860s.

The type 2 marker was introduced in the 1850s and was used until the late 1870s (fig.4). The more 'ecclesiastical' tablets (types 3 & 4) were used in the period 1860s through 1890s, originally to mark the graves of children or young adults, and then adopted to mark the burials of adults. Innovations in marker shape were first introduced for the young, and only later used for adults. The ecclesiastical stype markers are similar to those used during the same period in non-Quaker cemeteries. They were often carved with motifs of a dove (fig.5), lamb (fig.6), or pointed finger (fig.7). They could have a Scriptural verse or poetic passage, an example of which is shown in figure 5. A particular Norman arch form of marker (fig.8) which is in a number of Quaker burying grounds is probably a mass-produced stone.

Beginning in the 1870s, markers of non-tablet form, made of marble or granite in the form of block, pulpit, pedestal, plaque or other massive forms, were introduced. These continue to the present time to be used in the burying ground. An example of one of the block-shaped markers is shown in figure 9. By the 1890s the material for these markers changes to granite from marble. Although these forms are more conspicuous to the visitor to the burying ground, they are not as noticeable in non-Quaker cemeteries where large monuments and mausoleums are prominent features.

The inscriptions in this publication are reported in two lists: an alphabetical listing by surname and a location index. The first row starts at the northeast corner of the burying ground with stones numbered consecutively, beginning with 1, from north to south. At the right side of each entry in the surname list is a two-part location number which indicates the row and number within the row where the marker with the particular inscription can be found. The two numbers are separated by a full stop.

The original number of markers in the burying ground is not known, as the published location index made in 1965 by the Pickering College students does not always correspond with my own findings. Some stones have apparently been removed or buried. Because many plots have no marker, some rows begin in the middle of the burying ground, while others begin at the northern property line. The fastest way to determine the location of the first marker of a row is to locate a known stone in the alphabetical index, and use the location designation to find your position in the burying ground.

Inscriptions on the oldest stones give the name of the deceased, relationship to other members of the family (for children), date of death and age at death in years, months and days. An example of an inscription on a marker of a child's grave is: HARRIET. / Daughter of / Geo. & Hannah / LOUNT, / Died / 8th of 7th mo. 1827 / AE 2 y's 3 mo. 23 d. (see figure 3). Later stones show changes in different parts of the basic inscription, including the use of a married woman's first name followed by the term 'wife of' or 'beloved wife of' and then the name of the husband, whether dead or alive. The phrase 'husband of' is not used on markers, even though the wife may have outlived the husband. The date of death on markers changes from the plain form to the common form, and the age at death is often shortened to only years and months, or in some cases, only the years are inscribed.

Quakers had a testimony against the use of modern form of date, insisting that a Christian community should not use the names of months and days that were derived from pagan religious practices. The result was to replace December 25, 1861 with 25th of Twelfth Month 1861 (see figure 4).

Each inscription in the alphabetical list is reported as it is on the marker; for example, lines of inscription are separated by a stroke '/' to show the lines as they are on the marker; upper and lower case letters are reported as they appear on the stones. Abbreviations and stops are retained where they can be clearly seen. There are two features that cannot be easily recorded: words inscribed in small capitals have not been distinguished from those in regular-size capitals, and the practice of inscribing a raised 'st' and 'nd' after the number they accompany, with an associated underline and two periods below the raised letters, is not reproduced in this list. For example, 2nd on a marker is shown as 2nd. Variant spellings of established surnames such as Phillips or Philips, Doan or Doane, are retained as they are on the marker but are arranged in order under the usual spelling.

Words which appear on the top edge of a stone are listed before the main inscription on the face (side) of the stone. The main inscription is recorded from top to bottom of an upright stone, including any Scriptural verse or poetry. The name of the maker is entered last, as it is always closest to the base of the stone. Where two or more inscriptions are on the same face of a marker, the letter a is used for the top-most inscription, b for the next, and so on, to the base of the marker. Only one marble tablet has an inscription on the reverse side (stone 15.6), an unusual practice for this form of marker. All the other stones have inscriptions on only one face. Finally, where part of an inscription is too weathered, damaged or covered by lichens, to decipher, I have indicated this with square brackets within a line or with three periods ... at the end of an inscription. Occasionally square brackets have been used to enclose a number of words to indicate there is some doubt as to the accuracy of the reading.

Figure 9.

By the late 1880s, non-tablet forms begin to appear in the Orthodox burial grounds, including this block form.

FOOTNOTES

¹For a study of this burial ground, see Newlands, D.L. "The Hicksite Friends Burying Ground, Newmarket", to be published in York Pioneer in 1983.

²The burying ground should properly be called the Orthodox-Progressive burying ground. I have retained the name Orthodox because it has become established in the literature, and to change it now would create confusion.
